Fot in the driest seasons barns are a saving of four or five shillings an acre; and, in wet seasons, the ready assistance which they afford in speedily securing the hay, has been known to make a difference in price of twenty shillings per load on a small number of loads. There are other advantages in the use of barns for this purpose, as there is not only less litter and waste, but, in merely hay districts, a great saving in straw, which is now an expensive article in many places, especially near large towns. But without having recourse to the erection Of expensive barns, many of the conveniences and advantages of...
