Not illustrated. 1833 Excerpt: . . . a Scotch banker, the brother or cousin of his own agent, was sojourning at Cheltenham; through whose busy intervention, divers loo-playing dowagers and mammas of many daughters, managed to make the acquaintannce of the bachelor-nabob. They found Richard Martindale quite ready to fall in love, and be fallen in love with; and with the natural hankering after a little bit of dignity so remarkable among the wise men and the foolish who visit us from the East, he soon anchored his affections on Miss Mary-Matilda Grindewell, daughter of a Dorsetshire Baronet; a bewitching creature, with pink cheeks, flaxen hair, a stiff muslin frock and coloured shoes, exactly after the pattern of an angel in a pantomime, or a doll at a bazaar. Sir John and Lady Grindewell were enchanted with the prospect of securing such a son-in-law; and though, on examination into his exchequer and treasury estimates,...
